WWII Documentary

If you watch the film with the sound turned off the soldier being carried from the jungle on a stretcher looks out as though dreaming himself into this bewildered forest.

In the long convoy of silence in the harmless shimmer of light on all that water he lifts a hand to touch the bark of a small tree.
The way one sense is heightened in the absence of another. The way the eyes are speechless betrayers of all that has gone wrong.

Take for example the prisoner emerging from a hole on an island north of Borneo. He doesn’t know to raise his arms in surrender.

The American must demonstrate the gesture as if in a schoolyard game to the new boy whose body holds the tension of eagerness and shame.

Hands raised eyes squinting from days in tunneled darkness the new prisoner bows.

Stumbling forward he bows; again and again he bows as if to the bayonet and not to the one holding it.
Now a prisoner rests lying down hands tied above his bandaged head. Now someone has given him a cigarette. His pinched lips make him look like he is grinning or trying not to laugh. How easy without sound to reinterpret victory. At the battle of Leyte Gulf a carrier deck explodes; then everywhere sleep & smoldering. One soldier lies cradled in the arms of another. They wear the drained stillness of children in sleep. Sweat drenched but no longer afraid they could be as dead as the others.
